The news spread like fire in a dry grassland. Peter Mulama had won not one but two million shillings in a competition! Two of the village men had clearly read his name in a newspaper. Before this time, Mulama was regarded as just another villagers in this remote neighbourhood. But now things were different. Mulama had won two million shillings and so he had suddenly become a VIP, a very important person.

Most people in this village could not comprehend how much two million shillings was. To the more knowledgeable ones, two million was a glossal sum uncountable, indescribable and more or less inexhaustible. So all of a sudden, Mulana become a celebrity. He was the one person that everyone wanted to be a friend or relative to. People claimed all sorts of relationships to him.' We are very close; someone was overheard saying in a matatu; Infact, we are like brothers To prove the closeness, he went on to claim that Mulama's great-grandfather was a cousin to his great-grandmother.

Others claimed friendship relationships with Mulama,' I am the friend of the brother-in-law of the friend of Mulama's best friend; said Msoti, the village tailor. Such stories flooded the whole neighbourhood. According to the wallagers, Mulama had suddenly become incredibly rich. He could buy shamba, houses, cars and everything else that wished for himself, his family and the whole village, not only for that time but for generations to come.

People started being very nice to Mulama. If he dropped something. People scrambled to be the ones who wound pick it up for him. Even Kosero who had publicly insulted Mulama at the market a week before now broadly smiled to him and treated him with honour and respect. People volunteered to help Mulama with anything he wanted done. They offered to weed his shamba and feed his animals. However, whatever they did, they made sure that Mulama noticed it.

The day came when Mulama was expected to collect his two million, according to the newspaper report. Some people offered to escort him to the relevant office in their local town. Mulama saw nothing wrong with fellow willagers joining him in his moment of joy and glory if they so wished. In fact he planned to throw a big party for the whole villager. That is why he was not embarrassed to wear a suit that a fellow villager lent him for this big day.

When they got to the right office, Mulama walked in ID card in hand and in the company of two of his twenty escorts. The others were waiting outside, softly rehearsing praise songs for the lucky Mulama. Still more waited at home, also dancing and singing.

Mulama handed in his ID card to the card to the cashiers and beamed with minor but serious spelling mistake! The winner, according to the competition organizers' records was Peter Molamo not Peter Mulama. The cashier pologized profusely, very very sorry indeed.

Mulana's two companions almost collapsed Mulama stood there, sweating and speechless, too shocked to hear whatever else the cashier was saying. Mulama started walking out in his borrowed suit, empty handed, dizzy and with his head bowed. Just then, another man walked in and handed in his ID card to the cashier.' Peter Molamo' the cashier called out, The real winner had arrived.
